

My father, sister and I have been going to a movie theater for a while now. The theater is mostly empty and the seats look old and worn out. The screen is small with a lot of pixelation, but it's almost always completely dark. It doesn't matter what time of day or what the weather outside, there always seems to be at least one other person in the theater who has brought their own snacks with them as well as plastic cups filled with soda or beer. But despite this sad little strip mall cinema, we still find ourselves willing to go back every week or so because something about going to that place instills a sense of nostalgia in us that we can't quite put into words. The little theater is our Eden, a place that truly feels like going back in time where everything seems to be new and fresh even though it's been there for decades. One day I was talking to my sister about how it would be fun to build a movie theater of our own, a place that felt more like a real theater with comfortable chairs and carpet on the floor. So I started making plans for the exact type of place I wanted. Naturally, I couldn't decide on just one type of design, so I made it part modern and part historic. The theater would have a mostly circular shape with two levels. The first level would have a lobby with several concession stands and a bar along with spacious, cushioned seats. In the back, there would be another smaller room for private parties, but also several private rooms where people could relax if they wanted to watch the movie alone. The second level is where the screen itself would be located. It has several balconies that are raised slightly higher than the bottom floor because I wanted to make it possible for people to see over each other's heads if necessary. I also think it looks nice this way because it feels much more like an old theater. The seating would be placed in a semicircle around the screen, but there would be a few rows of seating where you could still see everything clearly from your seat. In the center is the back wall which consists of two large windows. The windows are placed at different heights to make sure that people sitting on both sides of the theater can have a clear view of the screen. The front of the building would have several smaller windows for security cameras and to let light into the building, just as it does in any other movie theater. For me, this part is extremely important because it's something that you wouldn't see in a modern cinema hall. Even though I can't make a detailed drawing exactly as I want it to look, I'm already starting to think of an area where people who don't have a lot of money can rent out chairs and watch movies for free. But they still wouldn't be able to see anything besides the screen because my current plan calls for no concession stands. The concession stand would be too expensive for most people who live in the local area, so they would probably just leave their drinks on their seats or bring them back to their cars. However, there is one part of the theater that's already made. It's called the screen.
